Goal of the day

This week we will focus on the CSS layout module: flexbox.

Before flexbox (w3c flexbox), the main modules used for creating layouts were:

- Block, for sections in a webpage
- Inline, for text
- Table, for two-dimensional table data
- Positioned, for explicit position of an element

The “Flexible Box” Layout Module (a.k.a. flexbox), makes it easier to design flexible responsive layout structure without using float or positioning.

Today’s session is divided in 2 parts. The first part is an interactive game to learn/train flexbox. The second part consists in creating 2 different layouts using the layout module.

You can find some useful readings/resources below as well as in Blackboard.

Exercise 1

Play the Flexbox Froggy game to practice your new CSS skills.

Exercise 2

The goal of this exercise is to create a layout using flexbox.

You are not allowed to modify the structure of the html template provided with the sources of this lab.

Exercise 1.1

The “layout-template.html” file contains the html code you need to turn into a layout. Next figure displays the expected result in screens greater than 600px wide.

Exercise 1.2

Use media queries to create a new layout when the screen is less than 600px wide (see picture below).
